OLYMPIA & Tomorrow, Saturday September 26, marks the 16th annual celebration of National Public Lands Day, the largest annual coast-to-coast, single-day volunteer effort to improve America's public lands. Nationwide, organizers expect nearly 130,000 volunteers to participate.

In Western Washington, the Washington State Department of Natural Resources (DNR) and partners are expecting hundreds of volunteers to spend the day clearing invasive plants, repairing trails, and picking up litter at three areas managed by DNR. Volunteers will even be removing abandoned vehicles from a state forest.

Commissioner of Public Lands Peter Goldmark will participate with volunteers at two of DNR's events: Tiger Mountain near Issaquah and then at Mima Mounds south of Olympia. The third event is at Yacolt Burn State Forest, north of Washougal.

"National Public Lands Day is an important day to appreciate the beauty and bounty of our state," said Commissioner Goldmark. "Whether you are talking about recreation, clean water, or revenue for our schools, public lands provide wonderful benefits for all Washingtonians."

DNR manages 5.6 million acres of public lands, including the forested alpine foothills of the Cascade Mountain range, shrub-steppe grasslands in eastern Washington, and marine and freshwater aquatic lands such as Puget Sound.

Along with providing revenue for trust beneficiaries such as public schools and universities, Washington's public lands provide healthy habitats to sustain our state's natural resources. These lands also provide access for the public to enjoy recreational opportunities such as hiking, mountain biking, horseback and off-road vehicle riding, and hunting and fishing.

National Public Lands Day events on DNR-managed lands:
Saturday, September 26

West Tiger Mountain Natural Resources Conservation Area
